In this latest edition of the podcast Michael Dolan joins Eddie to discuss the forthcoming match against Rangers. Together they take a look back at the performance against Kilmarnock and try to second guess what will happen on Wednesday night. Predictions are made and both Michael and Eddie make themselves hostages to fortune by confidently stating that it's in the bag. The guys also take the time to praise some of the new managers who have joined the SPL this year and to comment on the willingness of sides to try and actually play football. They then contrast this by discussing Rangers' inability to do the same.

Finally they discuss the appointment of Willie Collum as referee and his lack of spacial awareness. Now there's a drinking game for the TV audience - every time he finds himself in the road of the play take a slug of whatever you happen to be guzzling.

As if all this isn't enough Krys from the Lostbhoys brings us the audio from the recent Celtic Graves Society event in honour of Tom Maley, one of the First Eleven. Hosted by Dianogah on a windy day this provides an insight into the life and times of the first man to score a hattrick for Celtic against Rangers. Here's hoping Gary Hooper listens carefully and picks up some tips.
